

Heatline receives new BSI accreditations

Heatline, one of the fastest growing manufacturers in the heating sector, has announced that it has been awarded two new British Standard Institution (BSI) accreditations.

The company has been recognised for its commitment to environmental standards and health and safety at work by being awarded the ISO14001 and OHSAS18001, building on Heatline's existing BSI accreditations.

Mustafa Findik, Sales and Marketing Director for Heatline, said "We are delighted that Heatline Manufacturing Facilities has been recognised by the BSI again for our continued evaluation and improvement of our environmental and health and safety procedures. We aim to review our practices on a regular basis to ensure that we are doing the best we can, not only for our customers but also for the environment."

The ISO14001 is an international standard that specifies a process for controlling and improving a company's environmental performance. This includes general requirements, planning, implementation and management reviews. Heatline achieved the ISO14001 by demonstrating compliance with legislation, reducing costs and improving efficiency.

As occupational health and safety is one of the biggest challenges facing businesses today, OHSAS18001 was introduced in order to help companies meet their health and safety obligations in an efficient manner. Heatline met this standard by identifying elements of their business that impact on health and safety and producing objectives for improvement and a management program to achieve them.

Both of these standards are periodically assessed by the BSI.

These awards come hot on the heels of the opening of Heatline's new training centre in Bedford, offering comprehensive instruction on the installation and maintenance of its complete boiler range.
